The filibusters were sent by rail to Guatemala City, where they will be temporarily detained. It was frankly confessed that the Bonilla revolution had been a failure through a succession of accidents. The plans of the filibustering expedition were upset by a British man of war, which was ruising through Honduran waters locking for the fillbusters for violating the neutrality laws. This compelled the seven vessels, mainly schooners, constituting the fleet, to keep on sailing. Christmas occupied Uletta as a base of operations. The vessels with the rest of the men made for Puerto Cortez with the intention of capturing that town, but a premature uprising there alarmed the government.
